New Construction Beginning at a Quicker Pace Despite Decline in Permits

Housing permits were down in February, wiping out the gains posted in January, while housing starts also reversed course, posting the year's first gains. All three of the housing measures in the residential construction report from the U.S. Census Bureau and the Department of Housing and Urban Development posted increases over the previous February.

Today's construction report says privately-owned permits for residential construction dropped by 6.2 percent to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1,213,000 compared to a revised rate of 1,293,000 in January. The January revision was from an originally reported rate of 1,285,000. February's number was 4.4 percent higher than the rate of permitting a year earlier, estimated at 1,162,000 units.

Analysts had expected a downturn in permitting, but a much smaller one. The consensus of those polled by Econoday was for an annual rate of 1,270,000 units. The actual number was below the lowest estimates which ranged from 1,235,000 to 1,290,000.

Permits for single family construction however were higher than in January, 832,000, up from a revised estimate (from 808,000) of 807,000, a 31 percent increase, and up a 13.5 percent from the previous February. Multi-family permitting was fell by 26.9 percent from the previous month, at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 334,000 compared to 457,000 in January, and was 15.7 percent lower on an annual basis.

On a non-adjusted basis, there were 84,500 permits issued during the month compared to 87,300 in January. There were 57,800 single-family permits issued, up from 53,600 the previous month.
